Introductory note

The newly built Missionary College of S Augustine was consecrated on 29 June 1848. The funds to purchase and to build (and then to pay its first principal William Hart Coleridge and his assistant tutors) had been raised by a group of enthusiasts with shared intentions.

First, to have a central training college for the church of England, where young men (aged 18 plus) would be trained in oriental languages and culture as well as Christian faith and practice before they were sent out as missionaries to India, Asia, Africa, the Pacific, and the Americas.

Secondly, to have a showcase for their own vision of the Anglican church: a branch of the Catholic church, bearing witness to a long history stretching back to those first missionaries who came from Rome with their leader S Augustine to Kent in 597 AD. They were making a statement about the continuity of the Anglican church. It was founded 1,250 years ago, it was reformed but not broken at the Protestant Reformation, and now they were proud to be standing again on the spot where Augustine and his monks had begun their missionary work in ancient England. With this day of celebration of the history and of the potential of the Anglican tradition, a new phase of evangelism would begin from the heart of the church of England.

So S Peter's day saw some 1,200 people come to Canterbury. The archbishop of Canterbury and his party left from London at 5am on a special train for Canterbury. There Dr Sumner dedicated the new chapel at the College, and shared the eucharist at midday with over 600 priests among a congregation which packed the cathedral.

A chosen few had seats ready and named for them in the chapel. A few more crammed in, to a limit of 130. The organisers had a seating plan, and lists of their names were reported next day in The Times and later in the Illustrated London News. Who were these names?

This project seeks to identify the people who were either in the named seats, or were named to have been in the chapel for its consecration. Among these are the initiators of the project. Robert Brett a doctor in Stoke Newington had written a letter to a church newspaper in 1843, drawing attention to the disgraceful state of the ruins of the Augustinian abbey; Edward Coleridge a loved master at Eton College pressured his friends to raise the funds (and contributed the proceeds of the sale of his art collection), and Alexander James Beresford Hope a rising Member of Parliament bought the site.

Hope appointed the architect, William Butterfield. He was the favoured architect of the Cambridge Camden Society, a group founded in May 1839 by Benjamin Webb and John Mason Neale to stimulate interest in church architecture and traditional Catholic worship. They were there, and lots of their fellow members of this Ecclesiological Society now based in London.

The day was important for the morale of the Catholic groups in the Anglican church. A proportion of those present had been influenced at Oxford by John Henry Newman - his conversion (or 'defection' as some bitterly put it) in 1845 from the church of England to the church of Rome had shaken them. Those who stayed with the church of England through that crisis now had a chance to show confidence and recover initiative. Here they all were - aristocrats and gentry, higher clergy, respected university academics, and the wealthy. A statement of influence and optimism.

A high proportion of these seated men had great wealth. We know that a number of them paid to build or rebuild parish churches in their own home parishes. However, despite the missionary cause of this big day, few of them gave much of their money for the church farther away from home. Charles Abraham soon joined his mentor George Augustus Selwyn in New Zealand, and a few others (notably Mr Justice Patteson) did have family who served the church rather than just the empire overseas. Lord Nelson stands out alone as one who was consistently generous over his whole life to missionary causes.

In 1849 the Missionary College was advertising for students. Hundreds came, and high standards of education were attained. Most of the young men were from humble homes, far far away from the worlds represented at the opening day. So given the general tone of the company rather than the future missionary candidates, it does look appropriate that the celebrations closed when Beresford Hope with his wife Lady Mildred (and her attendant ladies) entertained 150 for a late lunch (lobsters, and fowl) back in the college grounds.
